

COMBAT MINDSET BRANDMARK

The taiaha at the centre

Army Command School

August 2026

The taiaha is a stronger centre than a spearhead. It is a rangatira's weapon, carrying skill, discipline and mana rather than force alone, and it already sits in NZ Army heraldry. It is drawn here in silhouette only: arero, upoko, ate and rau, with no carving detail.

Three arcs

The pressure that surrounds, and the Prepare, Perform, Recover cycle.

A solid core

Self-command. The centre holds while the environment does not.

The taiaha

Trained, disciplined capability. Held ready, used decisively.

See clearly. Remain controlled. Act decisively.

APPLICATIONS

On white

Single colour

In the patch

Reduced

AT SIZE

30 mm

20 mm

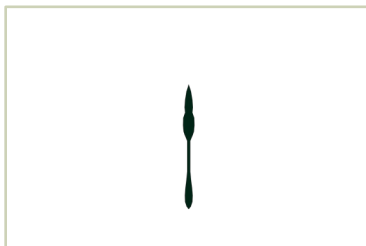

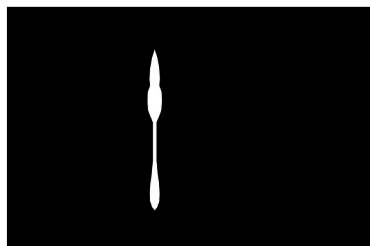

12 mm

7 mm

WHY THE HEAD, NOT THE WHOLE WEAPON

Drawn to true proportions the taiaha is very slender: the ate is roughly one fiftieth of its length. At badge size that shaft becomes a hairline and the weapon reads as a stick. The mark therefore carries the arero and upoko, the part that is unmistakably a taiaha, with the collar binding struck in red.

Note. The taiaha already appears in NZ Army heraldry, so this draws on the Army's own device rather than introducing new imagery. Even so, a mark that places a taiaha at its centre should be confirmed through the appropriate cultural advice before it is adopted.